 - Claims for Interference with Family and Medical Leave Act (“FMLA”) rights
 - Disability Association Discrimination Claims
- Tips for Minimizing the Risk of Litigation
- Questions

EEOC Steps Up Enforcement

- EEOC's Strategic Enforcement Plan
 - Six National Priorities Identified
 - “Addressing Emerging and Developing Issues”
 - Accommodating pregnancy-related limitations under the ADAAA and PDA
 - Coverage, reasonable accommodation of disabilities, qualification standards, and undue hardship
- EEOC's Performance and Accountability Report
 - 38% of “merits” filings included ADA claims in 2013
 - $14MM collected in connection with 59 ADA lawsuits the EEOC resolved in 2013

Pregnancy: Disability Issues

- The Americans with Disabilities Act Amendments Act of 2008 (“ADAAA”)
 - Expanded coverage to include many pregnancy-related impairments as disabilities
 - New definition of “substantially limit” & “major life activity”
 - Common examples that an employer must typically accommodate:
 - Morning sickness
 - Pre-natal visits
 - Physical limitations, e.g., inability to remain standing for periods of time

Pregnancy: Discrimination Issues

- The Pregnancy Discrimination Act (“PDA”)
 - Amended Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964
 - Gender discrimination includes discrimination arising from “pregnancy, childbirth, or related medical conditions”
 - Pregnant applicant or employee must be treated the same as other non-pregnant applicants or employees based upon her ability or inability to work
 - Common trouble areas include hiring decisions, promotions, and disability leave requests
 - Pending certiorari petition in Young v. UPS (4th Cir. 2013)

FMLA Claims: Interference & Retaliation

- Interference With Exercise of Rights & Retaliation for Exercising Rights
 - Discouraging employees from taking leave (through words, actions, negative employment conditions)
 - Limiting or refusing to recognize FMLA rights and grant benefits (denying leave, denying benefits maintenance, denying job protection/restoration)
 - Refusing to grant leave extensions
 - Terminating an employee on leave
 - Manipulating employees to avoid responsibilities under the Act

FMLA Claims Continued: Case Law Examples

- Valid interference claim where employer transferred employee to a different position upon reinstatement, then later terminated employment
- No interference claim where employer asked employee to go part-time, rather than take leave, where question was valid to determine what type of leave would be most appropriate
- In many cases, courts have found that negative or derogatory comments about or near the time of leave constitute direct evidence of discriminatory intent
- NOTE: Employees are entitled to protections, as if they did not take leave. They are not entitled to greater protections. In other words, if they would have been terminated anyways (violation of work rules, downsizing), FMLA does not afford a greater protection than that afforded to others.

Disability Association Discrimination

- ADA prohibits discrimination against disabled employees and employees with a relationship with a disabled person
- Expected uptick in claims because of expanded family leave laws
- No accommodation required
- Four elements:
 - Qualified for position
 - Subject to adverse employment action
 - Known to have “a relative” with a disability
 - Inference that relative’s disability was factor

Disability Association Discrimination (cont'd.)

- Three recognized theories of liability:
 1. Expense: Increased health benefit plan costs
 2. Disability by association: Risk of becoming disabled, either by contraction through relative or genetic predisposition
 3. Distraction: Employee will be inattentive at work because of relative's disability
- Disclosures during interviews
- Employer's length of awareness of association is usually critical: Stansberry v. Air Wisconsin Airlines Corp. (6th Cir. 2011)

Tips for Minimizing the Risk of Litigation

- Check federal, state, and local laws
- Develop and disseminate a strong EEO/Nondiscrimination policy
- Review employment policies/handbooks in light of changing laws, such as FMLA updates and expanded definition of disabled under ADAAA
- Train decision-makers regarding interview questions, application decisions, and leave requests
- Have a leave policy with some flexibility in light of the specific facts and the law at play (e.g., ADA)
- Establish step-by-step protocols for when employee's complain internally or request leave
- Establish consistent policies and practices, as well as a mechanism for ensuring that you are treating employees equally
- Ensure that all employment decisions are well-documented and transparent
